Jamie Frank, a 13-year-old boy from Texas, decided to give up a glittering bar mitzvah party and instead chose to mark the transition from childhood to adulthood in an act that everyone will remember.

With the gift money he received, the charming boy bought Nike shoes and gave them to children of clubs run by the social services department in Kiryat Bialik.

Nike, who heard about the initiative, decided to join Jamie's social venture and even increased the number of shoes donated.

In order to further expand the initiative, Jamie and his older brother Keren founded the "kickpin foundation".

Jamie said that as a sports fan and an avid basketball player, he thought that most children who could not afford it would be happy to get their sneakers in order to maintain a healthy and active lifestyle and feel equal among their friends.

Jamie's project in Israel was joined by Nike EMEA Jordan Brand, which represents Nike in Europe.

Ernie Dreimer and the Galila Association, who represent donors and philanthropic foundations in Israel, have linked Jamie and his family to the welfare department of the Kiryat Bialik Municipality.

The children of the clubs in Kiryat Bialik will not forget Jamie Frank, who brought them great joy. Jamie also received a certificate of appreciation signed by Mayor Eli Dukorsky for his generous contribution: "I thank Jamie for giving moments of joy and happiness to the children of our city," said Dukorsky.
